

Women still underrepresented in key industries

Particularly crime, war and violence.

Recent statistics show that women continue to be severely underrepresented in several crucial sectors of society, particularly in the fields of crime, war, and violence. Despite making up roughly half the population, women account for a mere 16% of arrests, leaving men to shoulder the burden of an overwhelming 84% of criminal activity in England and Wales. This glaring disparity has left many wondering: Are women simply not trying hard enough to break the law?

“It’s disappointing to see women consistently underperforming in these key areas,” said gender equality expert, Dr. Nowomen Nocry. “How can we claim to have achieved true equality when women aren’t pulling their weight in homicide or war crime statistics?”

As society grapples with this pressing issue, some forward-thinking individuals have proposed innovative solutions. “Perhaps we need to implement quotas for female participation in gang activity and armed insurgencies,” suggested one think tank researcher. “It’s 2025, for crying out loud. It’s high time women started killing, maiming, and pillaging at the same rate as men. Through their stubborn refusal to embrace their inner criminal, women are complicit in perpetuating the patriarchy!”

The situation in armed conflicts paints an equally troubling picture of gender disparity. In 2022, over 600 million women and girls lived in conflict-affected countries, and a staggering 90% of current war casualties are civilians, with women and children comprising the majority of these non-combatant victims. Yet, despite their overwhelming presence in war zones, women continue to be severely underrepresented in active combat roles. This has prompted critics to ask if women are taking the easy way out by dying as civilians instead of stepping up to the plate as combatants.

Until then, it seems the glass ceiling in crime, war, and violence remains firmly intact, leaving women to wonder when they will finally be able to break through—preferably with a well-aimed punch ruled as assault.

Tories promise “Free Palestine” as part of austerity platform

Free Palestine! Free Gaza!

In a stunning policy shift that has left political pundits scrambling for their dictionaries, the Conservative Party has announced its latest austerity measure: Making Palestine free!

Speaking from the Conservative Party Headquarters, Leader of the Opposition, Kemi Badenoch, declared, “We’ve tried cutting everything else, so why not free an entire region? It’s the ultimate cost-saving measure. Plus, it’s kind of our fault anyways if you look at history. Shoutout Mandate of Palestine!”

The plan, cleverly named “Operation Desert Bargain”, aims to kill two birds with one stone: slash government spending, while also resolving the Middle East conflict. “By making Palestine free, we eliminate the need for costly military interventions and endless peace talks,” explained Shadow Chancellor, Mel Stride, while frantically punching numbers into a calculator. “Turns out, not oppressing people is surprisingly cost-effective.”

As the largest financial supporter of Israel’s military operations, the United States has approved at least $17.9 billion in security assistance for Israeli military operations in Gaza and elsewhere since October 7, 2023, historically approved $1.58 billion in aid to Israel, primarily as military assistance, and committed to providing an additional $3.8 billion per year through 2028. While not matching the scale of US support, the United Kingdom has also contributed significantly to maintaining the status quo in Palestine:

Local Government Pension Scheme funds in the UK invest over £12 billion in companies enabling Israel’s military occupation and actions against Palestinians. This includes £450 million invested in BAE Systems, which manufactures components for Israeli fighter jets, and £80 million in Caterpillar, which produces bulldozers used for demolishing Palestinian structures. Furthermore, since 2008, the UK has licensed arms exports to Israel worth at least £576 million. In 2022 alone, UK military exports to Israel totalled £42 million.

In the conclusion of her address to Tory members, Badenoch promised, “For the first time, a British party will keep its word: Promises made, promises kept. Free Palestine, Free Gaza, Free Rafah, Free the West Bank, Free Israel, and Free Jews everywhere from the stain of colonial Zionist politics!” Badenoch paused, before continuing with renewed vigour in her eyes, “Fuck it.. free healthcare, including dental! Free mental health care and therapy! Free fries when you already purchased the burger! Free education and school lunches! Free Apple chargers when you buy Apple products! Free tampons and menstrual products! Free luggage on airplanes! Free shipping, free water, free speech, and free the nipple!”

China demands trading partners adhere to human rights and international law

China builds a Great Wall around the moral high ground

China shocked the world last week when it announced that it will only trade with countries that adhere to human rights and international law. Speaking to domestic and foreign press in Beijing, Chinese Foreign Minister, Wang Yi, declared, "We've had enough of Western barbarians and their flagrant disregard for human dignity. From now on, China will only engage in commerce with nations that can prove they haven't pepper-sprayed a peaceful protester or promoted genocide in at least six months."

The announcement has sent shockwaves through the international community, with many Western nations scrambling to hide their tear gas canisters and police batons. "We're not quite sure how to respond," admitted one anonymous US State

Department official. "We haven't gone that long without violating Americans' rights since it was still the British doing it."

In response, Wang Yi said, "We're simply asking our trading partners to meet the bare minimum standards of human decency. Is that really too much to ask?"

The announcement has thrown Western capitals into chaos. In Washington D.C., lawmakers are reportedly considering a bill to reclassify tear gas as a "freedom mist" to circumvent the new rules. Similarly, the Environmental Protection Agency has pushed to recognize pollution as "atmospheric redecoration", exacerbated by so-called "freedom fumes". Furthermore, the UK and US health sectors have confronted China's new policy of recognizing affordable and time-sensitive healthcare as a human right, citing studies that show health is in no way correlated to quality or longevity of life.

As the dust settles on this geopolitical bombshell, one thing is clear: the world order is changing. China's demand for ethical trade practices has left many wondering if we have entered a bizarre parallel universe where human rights actually matter in international relations.

In the meantime, Western nations are left to ponder an uncomfortable question: How did we become the bad guys in a story we get to write?

Student gets first hand job experience

Inside one student's gripping tale of professional growth

For whom graduation looms, making a first foray into a daunting and perpetually stunted job market is ever on their minds, while CVs and cover letters are ever in their hands. Inside this tough environment, one student bares all in their tale of getting a firm grip on the workforce.

"I was thrilled to get my hands on this opportunity," said the student, beaming with excitement. "It's been a real learning curve, but I'm grasping every chance to improve my skills." When asked about the job's challenges, they replied, "Well, it's not always easy to get a handle on things, but I'm working hard to make sure my work doesn't slip through my fingers."

Colleagues have praised the student's eagerness to learn, noting, "They're always willing to lend a hand, even when things get a little sticky." The student's supervisor added, "We're impressed by their ability to take things in hand and run with them.

While they have encountered the expected growing pains, I'm impressed with how much they've come," The supervisor paused to wipe their surprisingly wet eyes, "into their own as an employee of this company. A real grower, not just a shower."

As for the student's future plans, they are looking forward to continuing their professional development. "I'm hoping to get a better grip on the industry and maybe even move into a more senior role where I can really take control," they said with a smile.

When asked about their future in this industry, the student had this to add, "It's not easy work. They make it look so easy on TV but those are real professionals. In reality, porn is hard work. All day, every day, it's hardly fucking or fucking hardly. But to be fair, the hand jobs are a pretty great perk."

This student's first hand job experience has shaped up to be a real success story. They are certainly making the most of their time and proving that with hard work and a firm grip, anyone can get head in their career. May this student's story inspire all those anxious about their future prospects that they too can grow and cum up through the ranks.

Christchurch instructs firefighters to save Einstein sketch over students

$E = mc^2$ stands for evacuate masterpiece, civilians second

Oxford Fire Station has issued new guidelines instructing firefighters to rescue a priceless Einstein sketch before saving any students in the event of a fire.

"We've crunched the numbers, and it turns out that one Einstein doodle is worth approximately 3.7 physics undergrads, or 6 PPE students, alternatively," explained Station Manager, I'lllet Youdie. "It's simple relativity, really." The new protocol also requires firefighters to undergo extensive art handling training and memorize Einstein's entire bibliography.

Local students have expressed mixed feelings about the policy. "On the one hand, I'd like to not die in a fire," said Sarah, a second-year chemistry major. "On the other hand, death and third-degree burns are sure to qualify for mitigating circumstances on my dissertation."

The Muskiest Insider

Only the globalist elite cabal can save us from the globalist elite cabal!

While already busy saving the United States from a working government as head of the Department of Government Efficiency, Elon Musk has managed to free up additional hours in the day by neglecting additional children he has had—seven since 2020, bringing the total up to 14 kids he saves time on by not looking after them. With this newfound abundance of time, he might be optimally positioned to take on the ultimate challenge: rooting out the globalist elite cabal that has been secretly controlling Europe since the dawn of time—or at least since Judaism invented rich people and greed, and Islam invented religious extremism and refugee crises.

Prompted by right-wing parties in Europe, Musk has expressed his enthusiasm for leading a task force to tackle this mission. “We need to focus on those who are using their wealth and influence to shape public policy and control media narratives,” Musk explained during a recent briefing. “These individuals often use their companies to bypass regulatory oversight and consolidate power. It’s a disgusting and obvious abuse of power. Those people should probably be in jail, huh?”

When asked for specific examples, Musk highlighted the importance of scrutinizing those who “spread misinformation on social media platforms to distract from their own power grabs”. He also emphasized the need to examine figures who have control over global resources needed in the defence of national sovereignty and more crucially, people’s lives. “We need to be wary of individuals who own critical infrastructure,” Musk cautioned. “Imagine if someone controlled the very fabric of our digital lives. Scary stuff.”

As Musk delved deeper into his strategy, he noted, “It’s crucial to understand the tactics of those who are undermining democracy from within. You hear so many stories about rich refugees buying influence in elections all over the world. That’s why they have it so easy.” His words were met with nods of agreement from the audience, who seemed to appreciate his nuanced understanding of the issue.

Musk’s proposed initiative has been met with both optimism and skepticism. In response to critics who warn that Musk will end up, “breaking everything and ruining the world”, the man had this to say, “You can’t destroy a cabal without first destroying everything else first.”

The diversity friend is still very much a thing

I’m sick and tired of being the only cool one in this group

In a recent study, researchers have confirmed that the “token diversity friend” phenomenon is absolutely alive and well in 2025. One local friend group has taken this concept to new heights, pushing the boundaries of what it means to be diverse.

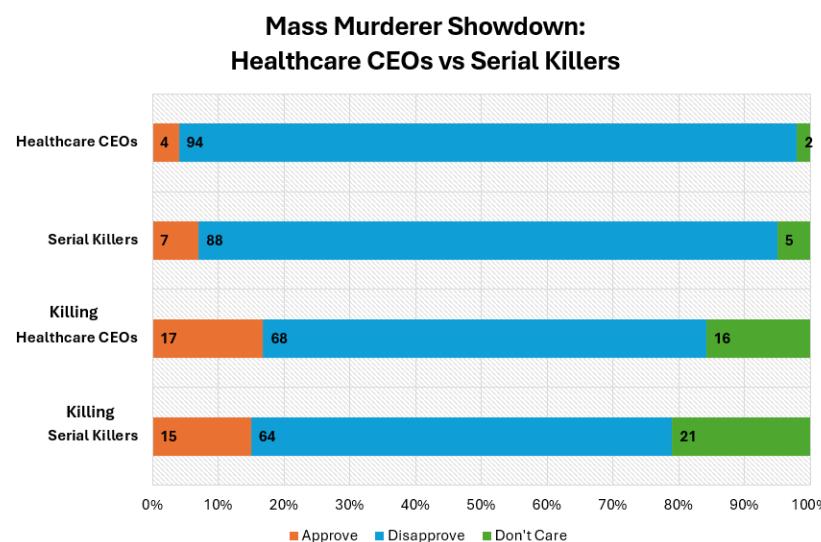

Initially believing she was recruited to diversify her friend circle’s racial makeup, Julia Stand-In, a hip 23-year-old laments, “Do you know how exhausting it is to constantly explain believing in rationality and the free market is so out?”

When asked why she does not find cooler friends, Julia shrugged. “It’s a heavy burden being the only cool one, but someone’s got to bear it.”

As friend groups across the nation continue to tokenize coolness, one thing is clear: being the only one who can dress themselves without girlfriend supervision is both a blessing and a curse.

Not all mass murder is created equal

At least serial killers do it for the love of the game, healthcare CEOs just suck

Recent polling on the comparative approval rating of mass murderers—serial killers vs healthcare CEOs—have ignited a renewed round of interest in both professions and their associated casualties. Internet users find that while serial killers are often driven by a twisted passion for their craft, healthcare CEOs seem to be motivated solely by the pursuit of profit. It is a tale of two killers: one with a sense of style and dedication, the other with a calculator and a spreadsheet.

Serial killers, like the infamous Ted Bundy, are often remembered for their charisma and cunning. They stalk their prey with precision, leaving a trail of intrigue and terror in their wake. In contrast, healthcare CEOs stalk their prey with premiums, deductibles, and copays, leaving a trail of financial ruin and despair.

As one FBI operative noted, “Serial killers are like artists, each with their own unique style and flair. Healthcare CEOs are more like accountants, except instead of numbers, they crunch souls.” It is a brutal comparison, but one that highlights the stark difference between those who kill for love and those who kill for profit.

In response, serial killers have begun to protest the comparison, claiming that healthcare CEOs are giving mass murder a bad name. “We’re not just mindless killers,” said one serial killer. “We have a code, a sense of honour. Healthcare CEOs, on the other hand, are just in it for the money. They’re like the Walmart of mass murder—cheap, efficient, and completely lacking in style. It’s vulgar, what they’re doing, it’s completely passé.”

To address this issue, a new rating system has been proposed to differentiate between types of mass murder. Serial killers will be rated on their creativity, cunning, and overall flair, while healthcare CEOs will be rated on their ability to maximize profits while minimizing patient care.

Econs' final trick(le up)

Economists worldwide shocked to find they've been holding the important graphs upside down!

A recent revelation has sent shockwaves through the economics community, revealing that economists have been holding their graphs upside down for decades. The stunning truth? Trickle-down economics has actually been trickle-up all along. It turns out that wealth was not trickling down to the masses; instead, to the shock of rich people everywhere, it was being skillfully channeled upwards to the already affluent.

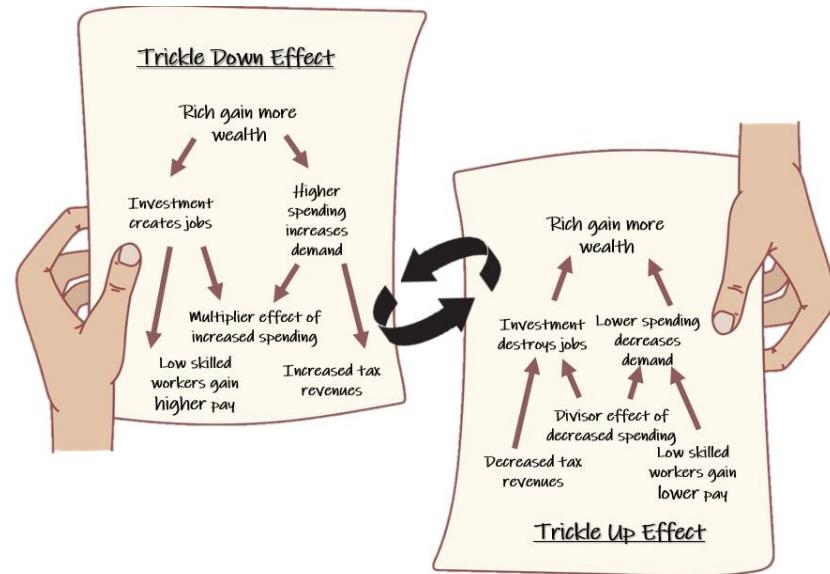

The news broke when a young intern, tasked with stapling reports, accidentally turned a graph right-side up. The room fell silent as economists stared in horror at the inverted reality they had been peddling for years. "We thought we were spreading the wealth," said one economist, "but it seems we were just spreading a myth."

As the news spread, economists scrambled to explain how they had missed this glaring error. "It's not our fault," claimed a leading economist. "We were just following the conventional wisdom... and by conventional wisdom, I mean the wisdom of our wealthy donors."

The implications are profound. It turns out that tax cuts for corporations and the wealthy were not intended to stimulate economic growth but to accelerate the upward flow of wealth. "We've been calling it trickle-down, but really, it's been trickle-up all along," admitted another economist. "We thought people were moving back in with their parents for the free Wi-Fi and skipping meals because intermittent fasting was trendy. Turns out they were just broke this whole time. And we never even realized..."

As economists delved even deeper into the truth, a more profound realization dawned on them. The entire field of economics, with its complex theories and models, had been a hoax—a tool to justify the concentration of wealth among the few. The graphs, the theories, the jargon—it was all a smokescreen to obscure the simple fact that wealth trickles up, not down.

In a moment of clarity, economists realized that the only true form of trickle-down economics is one where wealth is redistributed from the top to the bottom—through a proletarian revolution. "We've been duped," declared a leading economist. "The only way to truly make wealth trickle down is to overthrow the system that keeps it trickling up."

And so, in a historic turn of events, economists from around the world gathered to issue a call to action. "Economists of the world unite!" they chanted. "We must tear down the false idols of capitalism and build a new economy based on true trickle-down principles—where wealth flows from those who have too much to those who have too little! From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs!"

As the revolution gained momentum, economists took their newfound zeal to the streets, urging workers to unionize and reclaim their power. Armed with spreadsheets and fiery rhetoric, they stormed private equity offices, and hurled molotov cocktails into consulting firms. Some were seen dismantling corporate logos with crowbars, while others handed out pamphlets titled "The Invisible Hand is a Fist—Fight Back!"

The once-staid economists, now radicalized, marched through financial districts, chanting slogans like "Hey, hey, ho, ho, neoliberalism's got to go!", and "Spread wealth, not sheets!" They occupied trading floors, multinational corporations, and their local Starbucks, demanding the beginning of a new era where wealth is shared, not hoarded.

The era of trickle-up economics is over; the era of proletarian revolution has begun. And in the end, it was not the graphs that were upside down, but the entire system itself.
